Defence Suggestions For American Vessels Based on British Rules

Washington, March 10.-The State Department laid down the principle tolay that American armed merchantmen would have a clear right to fire on and, if possible, to sink German submarines tacked. It will be recommended to Both Parties Are Liberal in masters of such vessels that this course be adopted, with the reservation that if the submarine is plainly not in position to attack the vessel it ought not will be given to the gun crews by any officer of the United States government. The gun crews will be entirely under the orders of the master of the vessel, who will be free to exercise his own judgment, with only the aid of suggestions drawn up by the State and Navy departments. This statement is made because the attempt by the government to control the action of gun crews with respect to submarines might be construed as converting the vessel into a public ship.

Rules for Armed Ships

The exact nature of the suggestions will not be disclosed to the public, but it is assumed that they will follow closely the instructions issued by the British government to commanders of armed merchantmen. The British government also makes it clear that "the worker is responsible for handling the ernment also makes it clear that that master is responsible for handling the ship and for opening and ceasing lire," and the instructions prepared for his guidance are not binding on him.

The following is taken from an instruction circular captured by a German submarine on the British steamer Weedfald:

Officials Await Effect of U.S. Order in Germany

Washington, March 10.—Government officials are watching closely for the offect produced in Germany by the President's decision to arm American merchant ships and by the State Department's reassertion of the right of such vessels to fire on submarines at sight.

Probably the only news that has reached Germany thus far has been through the Reuter Agency. Officials suppose that Germany has received it with a grain of salt, as it does all English news, and will wait for wireless the state of the salt of the rines. Government officials are wonder-ing whether it will have the effect of discouraging attacks on the versels. It is not thought likely that arming a few American ships, in addition to the scores of Allied merchant vessels that are already armed, will have much effect in changing the submarine policy.

It will, however, definitely dispose of It will, however, definitely dispose of the hope cherished by some officials that Germany would take especial pains to avoid attacking American ships with-out warning. To warn an armed vessel, it is admitted, would be suicide.
